

Synopsis

Metropolitan cities are believed to be hectic with people on the toes round the clock to earn livelyhood. The other side of the coin is village life where even the elderly folks get up early morning and steps straight into cattle shed, to clear their dunk, cleaning space and milking cows/buffaloes. After a sip of paddles to the field to cater for green fodder for cattle. Pulling bicycle with huge weight of grass reaches cattle. The entire grass dry and green is routed through the arms driven machine to shape it small and easily edible. Agriculture care, sowing, maintaining, reaping and disposal through out the year is untiring activity but the charm of the face is never lessened and every moment of life is enjoyed in a better way without undue stress as compared to metropolitan cities. Watering the harvests during moonlit/darkened nights is a routine matter. Although remains constantly involved in activities yet socialising is never lost. Despite the fact that life remains restless like Seconds needle of the clock which keeps on running till the battery (life) is exhausted, yet morale always remains high smiling at other needles with the sportsman spirit "Catch me if U can".
