In a dimly lit neighbourhood, a young boy named Ravi watched as two girls gleefully burst crackers. His eyes twinkled, mirroring the sparks from their fireworks. A longing surged within him to revel in the same joy.

Rushing home, Ravi excitedly showed his mother the girls' celebration, pleading for crackers. His mother's loving eyes clouded with sorrow; their humble means couldn't stretch to afford such luxuries. Tears streaked down Ravi's cheeks, his heart heavy with disappointment.

That night, the girls noticed Ravi's sadness from afar. Moved by empathy, they approached him, handing over a simple fuljhadi stick. Ravi's face lit up, gratitude filling his heart. The trio laughed and played, forming an unexpected bond under the shimmering night sky.

The following day, Ravi surprised the girls with handcrafted Diwali gifts. Their exchange sealed a budding friendship, uniting them with shared laughter and kindness. Despite different circumstances, they discovered a world where happiness wasn't defined by possessions but by the joy found in camaraderie.
